Report of Two Day Workshop on "Computational Modeling and Drug Design" on 4-5 th April 2018 at Department of Chemistry, SN College Chengannur Computational modeling techniques have long been used for the synthesis of molecular structure and cost-effective (virtual) experimental analysis prior to synthesis. Computational techniques, especially molecular modeling, play a vital role in the drug design process. Ideally, the computational method will be able to predict affinity before a compound is synthesized and hence save enormous time and cost. Although progress was being made in computer aided drug design, the potential for high-throughput screening had begun to take precedence as a means for finding novel therapeutics. The method has the advantage of requiring minimal compound design or prior knowledge, and technologies required to screen large libraries have become more efficient. Most importantly, drug design projects may fail without the efforts of experts in computational modeling. Our department is involved in the identification of phytochemical based leads using computational methods such as Schrodinger software. At this context we organized a workshop under the sponsorship of Kerala State Council for Science, Technology and Environment (KSCSTE) to promote the scientific aspirations of post graduate students, researchers and faculties from various colleges in Kerala. The workshop was also intended to provide a common platform for the delegates to share knowledge and to plan strategies for modern drug research by intellectual interaction with experts in the field.
